

How Social Media Can Influence Career Choices

Social media is a very powerful tool that people use every day. There is tons of information on social media, and it is now becoming a common thing to use for certain information as well. If you use TikTok, think of the last time you searched something up on the app because you didn't know about it, or even YouTube, you were looking for information from a person because it's more convenient, and it makes more sense.

Social media is now increasingly shaping what people want to do for a living. There are thousands, if not millions of videos on different platforms like YouTube, TikTok, Instagram, and Facebook, of people showing off their lavish lifestyles, and a bunch of expensive things like supercars or luxury apartments. Through these platforms, including job platforms like LinkedIn and Handshake as well, students are able to see what different careers look like and learn about the skills needed to succeed. However, some of this comes with pros and cons, because some of these platforms have people who use other people's videos, or they're lying about how they've earned their income. This is very common with fraudsters, and has been an important factor in the increase of fraud within the younger generation. The Crypto community is very known for having members of the community do this as well, as fraudsters are also common in this community.

A recent study examining college students found that social media plays a significant role in the influence of career decisions, by exposing students to different job opportunities, industry trends and professional communities. A great example of one of these communities is the trading community. There are multiple groups and teams of people who are focused on making trades and staying within market trends, a lot of these will have chat servers and post alerts to let other traders know about a trade with potential value. The research also found that social media helps and encourages students to shape their work values like salary, stability, and a personal and work life balance.
